Diversity Fellowship in Lawyering Process at Denver Law

The Lawyering Process Program at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law seeks to hire a diverse, entry-level candidate interested in starting their academic career teaching first-year legal writing, research, and analysis in our Lawyering Process Program.

Lawyering Process is a required first-year, two-semester course that uses small classes to teach legal research and writing, document drafting, and professional practice skills. Denver Law recognizes the significant lack of diversity among professors in legal writing and hopes to address this shortcoming at home, while spurring a national movement to diversify the profession.

This position is a half-time Visiting Assistant Professor of the Practice of Law within our Lawyering Process Program that allows for learning the art of teaching legal skills in a top-ranked legal writing program. The duration of the appointment is one year with possibility for a renewal for a second year depending on funding availability. The Visiting Assistant Professor will have the opportunity to develop scholarly interests and credentials, as well as to create course materials. The Visiting Assistant Professor has the option to continue practicing law part-time, but the appointment is ultimately designed to launch the candidate into the national law school teaching market.

Experience (Required):

- Juris Doctor or equivalent from an accredited law school
- At least two years of legal practice experience is required
- Applicants must have an interest in teaching
- Excellent legal research, analysis, reasoning, writing and communication skills
- The ability to work both independently and cooperatively

Experience (Preferred):

- Past teaching experience at any level is strongly preferred.
